Passage 1

In a semi – arid region, a community faced recurring water shortages despite receiving moderate annual rainfall. Over time, the villagers attributed the crisis to external factors – declining rainfall, increasing population and inadequate government support. However, a visiting environmentalist observed that much of the rainwater flowed away unused due to absence of storage systems.

Instead of proposing large- scale interventions, she suggested reviving traditional water- harvesting methods that had once been practiced in the region. While some villagers were sceptical, considering these methods outdated, a few agreed to experiment, within a year, the areas that adopted these practices showed visible improvement in water availability.

Interestingly, the total rainfall had not increased. What had changed was the community's approach – from passive dependence to active conservation. The shift was gradual but significant, challenging the assumption that solutions must always come from outside.

SAMPLE PAPER

D) Rainfall distribution in the region remained uneven.

Passage 2

Nisha had always believed that confidence was the key to success. She spoke assertively, made quick decisions and rarely second – guessed herself. This approach often worked in her favour, earning her recognition among peers and teachers alike. However, during a group project, her tendency to dominate discussions began to create friction.

While Nisha believed she was being efficient, her teammates felt unheard. Gradually, participation declined and the quality of ideas suffered. When the projects were evaluated, it became evident that the outcome lacked depth, despite Nisha's strong individual effort.

Reflecting on the experience, Nisha realised that confidence, when not balanced with openness,
